Chapter 1 by Janice Nathania Han

Long, long ago, there lived a beautiful and kind daughter of a nobleman named Xinderella; so beautiful, so kind, so perfect that even the most hateful, most pathetic excuse of a Fon was smitten at the sight of her. She loved spending her time reading books by the garden's pond, deeply thinking about the Literature of life's hardships as she gently flipped through them page by page.

When people passed by, she would greet them with her brightest smile. She would ask them how they day was going for them, and had never failed to wish them all the best after the conversations were wrapped. Everyone agreed; the sun paled in comparison to Xinderella.

Everyone loved her.

Including the small, filthy rodent with a short tail, dirty brown fur and a nasty pair of beady eyes resting on its grotesque head.

Chapter 2 by Phantim

Most humans hated rats. Especially dirty ugly ones like him. Not Xinderella though. She talked to him and gave him little treat sometimes. He followed her around, watching her from sewer pipes and roofs of houses. At night he would watch her go to sleep before nestling into her underwear drawer and sleeping himself. All he cared about was Xinderella, if he wasn't looking for food or sleeping, he was watching her. She had become his obsession. It was futile though, everyone loved her, he wasn't special. Worse he wasn't even human, or handsome, or even rich.

One day though, he decided to stop watching her and make it real. He was going to search high and low for the one thing that would help him. He was going to look for magic.
